DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

VILLA PACE is a rambling one and two storey stuccoed masonry house designed in the twentieth century to recall an Italian villa. The cross-shape of its principal section is masked by varying roof heights and other service wings to the east of the principal cross. Walls are all covered with stucco and roofs are of red tile. The several exterior angles are screened as court yards, one open to the north as the principal entrance, others private. Numerous small details are incorporated to recall the original period and place: windows of varying shapes; fountains and other terra-cotta decorations; arched chimneys; balconies and other iron details.

The principal entrance, at the end of the north transept, opens into a large two-storey foyer; the principal stair rises with an intermediate landing immediately above the entrance. A tall one-storey music room is in the west transept, a lower dining room is in the east and a library is in the south beneath the principal bed chamber. The relative plainness of the exterior surfaces contrasts with the exquisite detail of the interior. All details are carefully designed and wrought to recall the original period and style: tile floors, paneled or vaulted ceilings with painted decoration, carved stone mantels, ornamental wrought iron railings. Each room is different, each a lavishly executed composition. Most of the decorations relate in some way to music, or to flowers, primarily roses, recalling the life and name of the owner.

VILLA PACE was designed by Palmer and Lambden, architects of Baltimore.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Dating from the third decade of the twentieth century VILLA PACE is a unique, carefully designed and finely wrought example of an Italian villa, regular and irregular at the same time, full of detail at every turn, all planned and executed to reflect and recall the life of its famous owner.

Villa Pace has been carefully constructed in the mold of an Italian villa. Its cross-shape form and elaborate interior detailing are completely in keeping with the professional occupation of its owner, Rosa Ponselle, a world-reknown opera star.

The seventeen-room house was built by Miss Ponselle and her former husband Carle A. Jackson in 1940. Designed by Palmer and Lambden, Baltimore architects, it carried a post-war price tag of $500,000. Villa Pace was named after an aria Miss Ponselle sang on the night of her debut with the famous Caruso at the Metropolitan Opera.

The house stands on a prominence overlooking the Valley, on the exact site of a pre-Civil War mansion known as New Stoneton built by Alexander Hamilton Stump on the land tract Lystra.² Later this house and considerable surrounding land were acquired by General Felix Agnus, a publisher and manager of the Baltimore American.³ Under the name Nacirema (which is American spelled backwards), the house was the setting for many parties attended by prominent national political leaders, journalists and businessmen.

After Agnus' death, the house and 191.148 acres were sold in 1926 to James Walter and Margaret (Wolfolk) Carter for $85,000.⁴ Carter razed the old mansion with the intention of building on the site. He did not and on October 9, 1937, the estate was divided into lots and auctioned. Subsequently the mansion site and 155 acres were sold to the Jacksons.⁵

When she purchased the Green Spring Valley property, Miss Ponselle had just retired from a long and distinguished career at the Metropolitan. At the time of her debut in 1918 she was the youngest dramatic soprano on record at the Met, and for twenty years she reigned supreme in the international opera world.⁶

Miss Ponselle has been a guiding light in the cultural development of Baltimore, having started the Baltimore Opera Company and serving as its artistic director. She has coached promising young artists, both local as well as those who have come to her from afar--Beverly Sills, Enrico de Giuseppe, Lili Crookasian, Spiro Malas, to name a few.

Over the years, the public has had the opportunity to tour the beautiful interior of Villa Pace. On such occasions the beneficiaries of her generosity have been the Baltimore Symphony, the Baltimore Opera and the Peabody Conservatory of Music.
